TWAS DOWN IN TENNESSEE.

How the Opposition of an Obdurate Parent to the Marriage of His Daughter WEE Overcome.

[For The SUNDAY HERALD-Copyrighted.] Colonel Rithers was fat but very game. I don't know why flesh should be taken into consideration when we speak of physical courage, unless, it is because we always regard a game man as a sort of hero and are quite unable, in our fancy, to clothe a hero in a superabundance of flesh. Rithers may not have been an ideal hero, but he was game. It is said that he once slapped Ben Thompson's jaws while that great hero of the shooters was trying to break up . old fellow was fat, and still worse was so short that he waddled along like a duck.

He had but one pride, a lovely deposite.

He looked upon her with the deep love of a devoted father and with the admiring eye of an artist. Indeed he was something of an of an artist. Indeed, he was something of an artist, having once painted a picture of a Tennessee river sunset, but unfortunately had to shoot a man who innocently asked if it did not represent a brush pile on fire.

Whenever Lucio Rithers went into society the old man went with her. He had compelled her to promise that she would never be married, and be had faith in her avowal; still he did not like to see her thrown in the way of temptation. Once a handsome commercial traveler took brazen eccasion to smile at her, but he left the community the next day, carrying with him a note which read something like this: "I should like to meet you early to-morrow morning, with a view to shooting an or-dinary size hole through your head. I should have obliged myself by doing so to-day, but this teing Sunday, and our law imposing a fine for firing a gun on the Sab-bath, I refranced. Do not let any business ongagement proyent our meeting, for I assure you that I shall detain you but a few moments."

One bright morning while a chipmunk was sitting on a stump, rythmically nod-ding his head to the song of a cat bird, the colonel stood under a tree, communing with nature and wondering how he was going to get the steers out of the corn field. He had just decided to waddle into the field and curse them out when a young man rode up to the fence, dismounted gracefully and ap proached.

"Is this Colonel Rithers," the young man asked.

"Yes, sah. What can I do for you?"
"The young follow, without replying, took out two pistols, and as he politoly extended their bandles toward the colonel,

The distance was measured and again they fired at each other. This time the colonel was slightly wounded in the leg. The young man bade him a polite good morning and rode away.

"Not excessively."

The young man produced two pistols.
"Look here," said the fat man, "I told you sometime ago that we were not acquainted, and now I positively refuse to associate with you until we have been introduced."

"Ah," the young man said, "I hope you will pardon my seeming lack of good breeding. I am John Piller."

This time the young man was slightly wounded, but he bowed gracefully and smiled as he rode away.

The season had undergone another change. The gray squirrel ran along the top rail of the fence with a brown nut in his mouth; the cat bird was teaching her young ones to fly, and the chipmunk slyly

"No, I can't say that I am."
"No, I can't say that I am."

"What for?" the colonel asked.
"I haven't the time nor the inclination to explain. Take one and step off about thirty steps."
"Young man," said the colonel, "I am not obstively annoying, sah. What the deuce

"I mean that I want to marry your "I mean that I want to marry your deputy I note."

The colonel measured off thirty steps, and at a signal mutually agreed upon, both men fired. The colonel caught a projectile in the fleshy part of his right shoulder.

"Good morning," said the young man.
"Good morning, sah," rejoined the colonel as he leaned against a tree, The young man gracefully mounted his horse and rode away, and the colonel went home and lay down.

"Lucke, did he threaten to shoot you unless you married him!"

Several mouths passed. The cat bird was gone and the chipmunk was hidden away under the snow. The colonel stood in the country road, watching the wild goese fly over. A young man came riding along at an easy canter; and, seeing the colonel, dismounted, tied his horse and apprached.

"Good morning," said the young man.
